History of Wolf Management in Wyoming

1920s

Gray wolves extirpated from the western 1974

All gray wolves in the U.S. (except Alaska) listed as an endangered species under the Endangered Species Act

1994

A plan is put into place to reintroduce wolves to Yellowstone, Central Idaho, and Northwestern Montana as an experimental, non-essential population. This will allow wolves to be killed outside of Yellowstone.

1995

Fourteen wolves captured in Alberta and relocated to Yellowstone.

2004

Idaho's and Montana's management plans for wolves after removal from the ESA are approved. Wyoming's plan wasn't approved because it didn't allow sufficient recovery levels in the states. The plan as written allowed for wolves to be listed as a predator in 85% of the state and killed at any time.

2009

Gray wolves are delisted from the ESA in Montana and Idaho, but not Wyoming- the Wyoming plan was still considered inadequate.

2012

After discussions between Wyoming and U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to create an acceptable post-delisting management plan, gray wolves are delisted in Wyoming. From 2012-2013, the state holds hunting seasons in the trophy game area.

2014

Gray wolves are relisted in Wyoming and protected from hunting once again. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service files suit to appeal the decision.

2017

The U.S. Court of Appeals reverses a U.S. District Court decision and issues a final mandate delisting wolves in Wyoming. This reverts management authority back to the state. Immediately, Wyoming set hunting seasons for the fall of 2017 and listed wolves as predators in nearly 85% of the state.

Wyoming's War On Wolves

Wyoming is required to maintain at least 150 wolves and 15 breeding pairs to keep state management.

Yellowstone and Wind River Reservation are required to have at least 50 wolves and 5 breeding pairs.

The rest of the state is required to maintain only 100 wolves and 10 breeding pairs.

Wyoming has set its wolf management number to 160.

On average, Wyoming is home to about 300 wolves.

Each year, Wyoming kills 50% of its wolf population- and has no interest in allowing wolves to live outside of the Northwest corner of the state.

Wolves are considered trophy animals in northwest Wyoming and predatory animals the entire rest of the state.

TROPHY ANIMAL

- Regulated by WY Game and Fish
- Need license and stamp to hunt-seasons and quotas that limit hunting.
- Black bear, mountain lion, gray wolf

PREDATORY ANIMAL

- · Regulated by WY Dept. of Agriculture
- No license needed; excluded from ethical and fair-chase rules. Can be killed any time of year by any means.
- Coyote, jackrabbit, porcupine, raccoon, red fox, skunk, cat, gray

WHAT CAN YOU DO?

Write a letter to Governor Gordon & ask to allow wolves to live in other parts of Wyoming. Write a letter to our WY
Game & Fish
Commissioners around early June (season setting time) & ask for lower wolf quotas in trophy areas.
