

WOLF REPORT

Wolves for many generations have been known to be devils and associated with evil, and for those false accusations led to the death of many wolves. Wolves have made a comeback since those dreadful times but still have a long way to go to make it back up to their average numbers. The Red wolf (Canis Rufus) is still struggling hard to make a come back in the U.S. The WCC (Wolf Conservation Center) helps to try to bring the Red wolf population back, it has helped a lot. Sadly, Red wolves still are endangered but with help from people and more wolf fans out there ready to help the WCC and other Organizations can help bring those Red wolves back!

Wolves are important to our ecosystem because if wolves went extinct the food chain would crumble. Wolves help keep down the elk and deer populations by getting the diseased ones, and the animal carcasses help provide nutrients to the earth's soil. That makes wolves very beneficial to the ecosystem. But, as there are huge wolf supporters there are wolf haters too. Those wolf haters usually consist of farmers and other people who own livestock, and because there is very little forest or wolf habitat for food, wolves go to the livestock so they can get an easy meal. And then that one single killing makes farmers and ranchers angry and that anger causes them to shoot the wolves. But there are wolf supporters that help wolves and love them! And huge wolf lovers and supporters are always there to help wolves recover from endangerment. And even though there is a bunch of wolf hatred there will always be someone who love them and will protect them. Wolves once even have been almost wiped out of existence but with the help of humans wolves were able to make a comeback and live alongside some humans with peace. Although there still are some certain wolf species that still need help such as the Red wolves, and the Mexican gray wolves there is a chance that they will replenish with humans help.
